

The Power & Impact of using We Expect Respect Program

Violence is a choice

1,515 responses

In a random data study of over 1500 North Texas high school students from the years of 2015-2018 we see here an exponential 20% change in the perception of violence in teens.

I think violence is a choice.

Name-calling and put-downs are forms of violent behavior

1,515 responses

Stuff like name-calling or putting someone down is a form of violent behavior?

Domestic Violence is about power and control

1,515 responses

The core education component to all DV work is the realization that abuse is not anger management, not the victim's fault and not due to emotional circumstances. Abuse is control. Student responses show a 34.9% change in perception of what control is once they have completed the We Expect Respect Program.

Relationship abuse is about power and control over someone.

Nope - Abuse is about something else.

6.6%

Kinda true - Depends on the situation...

10.4%

Victims of dating violence deserve the abuse

1,515 responses

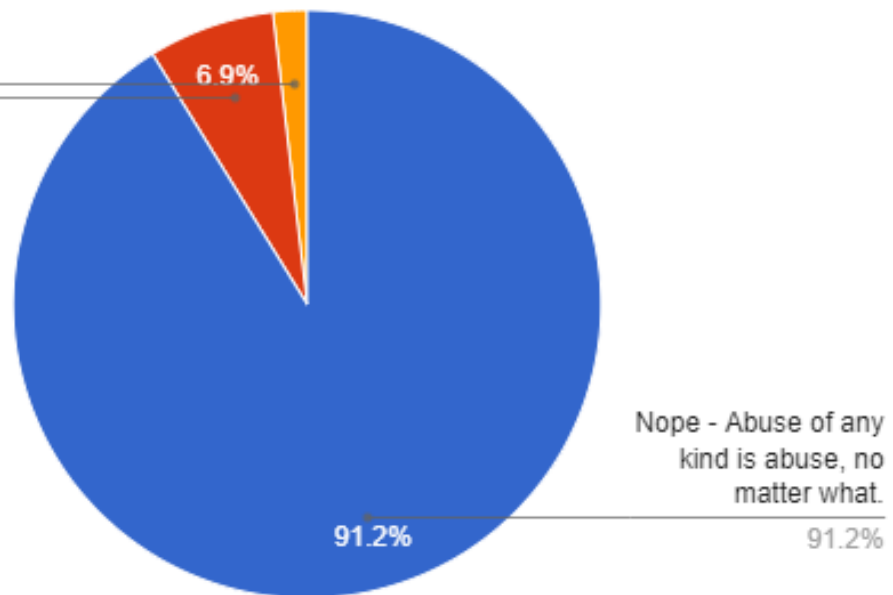

Sometimes victims of dating violence deserve the abuse.

Super True - They ask for it.

1.9%

Kinda True - Depends on situation

6.9%

I know how to set boundaries

1,515 responses

- True
- Somewhat True
- False

Personal empowerment, and self-awareness of value and options is key to bringing about change. Our teens walk away from our programs knowing they are empowered to protect and defend themselves against control and violence of any kind.

I know how to set boundaries

1,080 responses

- True
- Somewhat True
- False

I trust myself to identify red flags

Nope - Don't even know what a red flag is.
1.7%

Kinda True - I can identify some red flags but not all.
18.2%

Super True - I know what red flags are.
80.1%

I think I need a safety plan. - I am willing to talk with someone.

I need to talk to someone. (We will contact you, so leave your name below.)
5.1%

I have an adult that will help me build a safety plan.
37.8%

No, I am all good.
57%